1. What is commonly called pepper in reality comes from two very
2. different families of plants. Black and white pepper both come from the fruit
3. of the Piper nigrum, a vine with fruits called peppercorns. The peppercorns
4. turn from green to red as they ripen and finally blacken as they dry out. The
5. dried-out peppercorns are ground to obtain black pepper. White pepper,
6. which has a more subtle flavor than black pepper, comes from the same
7. peppercorns as black pepper; to obtain white pepper, the outer hull of the 8. peppercorn, the pericarp, is removed before the peppercorn is ground.
9. Red and green peppers, on the other hand, come from a completely
10. different family from black and white pepper. Red and green peppers are
11. from the genus Capsicum. Plants of this type generally have tiny white
12. flower and fruit which can be any one of a number of colors, shapes, and 13. sizes. These peppers range in flavor from very mild and sweet to the most
14. incredibly burning taste imaginable.
15. Christopher Columbus is responsible for the present-day confusion over 16. what a pepper is. The Piper nigrum variety of pepper was highly valued for 17. centuries, and high demand for pepper by Europeans was a major cause of 18. the fifteenth-century push to locate ocean routes to the spice-growing
19. regions of Asia. When Columbus arrived in the New World in 1492, he was 20. particularly interested in finding black pepper because of the high price that 21. it would command in Europe. Columbus came across plants from the
22. Capsicum family in use among the people of the New World, and he
23. incorrectly identified them as relatives of black pepper. Columbus
24. introduced the spicy Capsicum chili peppers to Europeans on his return from 25. the 1492 voyage, and traders later spread them to Asia and Africa. These
26. Capsicum peppers have continued to be called peppers in spite of the fact
27. that they are not related to the black and white pepper of the Piper nigrum
28. family.
